LITTLE MYRTLE.

Dear, my Question, babbling all the day
"What am I? Tell me ere my curls grow old"
I cannot tell thee, sweet, though curls be gold,
And thou reiterate till they be gray.

O little Quercy, like a rose unblown,
With faded mysteries in pink and white,
Love cannot solve thee in this morning light,
Nor Wisdom when thy threescore years have flown.
—Wilsey Martin in London Athenaeum.

MRS. MAYO'S SECOND.

Mrs. Mayo's first husband was stretched upon his dying bed.

The doctor had told him so kindly but frankly, and advised him to make his will.

He lay thinking how he should divide his small fortune between his wife and their two pretty children, when suddenly it occurred to him that his young wife might marry again, might have a second husband.

He glanced at her, and he sitting close by the bed, her fair face worn with waiting and grief, the tender tears in her dark blue eyes. The blood that had been coursing so sluggishly through his veins suddenly bounded forward in a burning tide.

He had realized more forcibly than ever before the noble beauty of his wife. He had craved her off seven years before from a score of lovers, and she was still young, still charming. History might repeat itself.

You would not have thought that a dying man could feel jealous, and yet a pang of cruel envy tore Hunter Mayo's heart.

Elinor's small, white hand—the one that wore his wedding ring—was nestled in his own. He pressed it feebly.

"Darling, you have been a good wife to me," he murmured, and her soft eyes beamed through her tears.

"Oh, Hunter, I've tried to be. I'm glad you realize it at last," she sighed, in a plaintive tone.

He continued tenderly: "You have been so faithful—you have never refused any wish of mine. And now, Elinor, I have one dying request to make."

His glance was so eager, his tone so pleading that she gazed into his thin, worn face in surprise.

"I know you will grant me your promise, dear heart, for it is only this, when I am dead, that you will always be true to my memory—that you will never marry again."

A little startled cry came from Elinor's lips, the color rushed into her cheeks, her eyes turned on him with a gentle reproach that touched his heart.

"Have I grieved you, my dear, by even hinting at a second marriage? Forgive me, I know you can never forget me, but I can't ease with your promise. Oh, my Elinor, I cannot bear that any other man should possess you, ever have the chance to fill my place, whom I have so fondly cherished."

His voice was quite strong and impassioned for a dying man, and his large, gray eyes searched her face eagerly. Was it fancy, or did her lip curl, ever so slightly, at his last words?

He repeated anxiously: "I cannot die in peace without your promise never to marry again."

Why did those burning tears sparkle out upon her pale cheeks beneath the drooping lashes? She murmured plaintively: "Oh, Hunter, you are cruel!"

"Cruel, Elinor? Do you mean that that you will refuse?"

And the most cruel blow his egoism had ever received came with her faltering answer: "Forgive me, dear, but I cannot promise."

The shock was so great that he closed his eyes and gasped feebly, believing that his last hour was at hand. In a moment Elinor was on her knees at his side, bathing his face with her warm tears.

"Oh, Hunter, do not die. I love you; I love you!"

The blood leaped quickly through his veins again. His eyes unclosed languidly.

"Then you will promise me?" he pleaded.

"Oh, Hunter, I cannot, must not! How can you wish me to blight my whole future?"

"And you really wish, then, to have a second husband?"

The dying man's voice was strong with scorn of her inconsistency.

"I—I—perhaps, Hunter, but only after a long, long time," and Elinor kissed him and clung to him lovingly; a strange proceeding which she had just rung his heart by her declaration that she would not live out her days a widow.

He pushed her away in a sudden gust of jealous anger.

"You have never loved me, Elinor!"

"I loved you always—love you still," she sobbed. "But, Hunter, it is just the other way! You have never loved me!"

He was speechless with surprise at this strange charge. "Never loved her? Why, then, had he loved her his wife and the mother of his beautiful children?"

Elinor went on speaking low, but clearly, like one under the stress of some overmastering emotion.

"God knows I do not wish to pain you, Hunter, but yet I would like to justify myself. They say that dying eyes see clearly, because the dying are already beyond the reach of earthly prejudice and passion. So, dear, will you let me speak out plainly now what has been in my heart for years?"

"Go on," he answered, in feeble wonder at the fire and passion of her lovely, tear stained face.

"I must tell you some of my inmost thoughts, and perhaps you will laugh at them," breathed the plaintive voice. "But, Hunter, I believe that God creates men and women as soulmates for each other, but they do not always find each other, and then, blindly, they wed as chance or fancy dictates, and disharmony and lack of harmony result. This has been our fate, my poor husband. We were not intended for each other, and each has failed to realize the other's ideal."

"Speak of yourself," he answered, "with unnecessary coyness; 'I never had an ideal,' you say."

"Oh, yes, you did, dear, though perhaps you did not realize it. Every one has an unconscious ideal, I think. You had yours, Hunter, but you did not find it in me," she answered, in that sweet, plaintive voice that always touched an echoing chord in the hearer's heart.

"When the honeymoon glamour was off you wearied of me. Do not think I did not see it, dear, even though my eyes were full of tears when I found how far you fell short of my ideal."

"What was your ideal?" he asked sneeringly.

Although he was dying, he could still sneer at a woman's romantic fancies, derived, he thought, from novels.

She sighed wearily, and answered: "It was very simple. Just a loving, appreciative companion. I have some-where read that men and women are created the perfect complement of each other, fulfilling in their wedded life the qualities separately lacking in each. I expected that my husband and I would be much together, so contented in our mutual love, so interested in the same things, so tenderly united, that we could never feel lonely apart. That was my fancy, and I know I was not wrong, for I have seen a few wedded lovers like that, and they were happy—happy as I had hoped to be, as I might have been, only—I married the wrong man!"

"Elinor," he cried, in angry remonstrance, but she had the courage of her convictions. She would not pause.

"It is God's truth," she said. "We are not soulmates, or we should have found more happiness together. I call you dear, for I love you, Hunter, in spite of the mistake of our marriage."

"It was no mistake," he muttered, with angry resentment.

"You are good to say so, but you flatter me." Her exquisite lips curled in spite of the dew on her long lashes. "But, Hunter, I have not been blind, and I have seen how little you cared for my companionship, how eagerly you sought pretexts for leaving my side and joining your male companions, in whose company you took such keen delight. Business, you always said, when I complained of loneliness, and yet I knew that it was only a subterfuge, for you were well to do, and I lived a life of elegant leisure."

"My society was irksome to you, and you released yourself from it all that you could. Why, I wondered, for other men always seemed to find my company agreeable, and I could have played the role of the married flirt if I had wished. But I did not choose, for I loved you well, in spite of your neglect. But it grew worse and worse. You ceased going out with me at all until in very shame I remained closely at home that the world might not observe and censure your indifference. Desperate with misery I reproached you, appealed to you, and you grew angrier, called me unreasonable and hysterical and grew colder and more indifferent than ever. Then I turned for solace to my two little ones, but I could not find the comfort that I sought. I grew hopeless and bitterly resentful, but suffered on in silence, realizing that I had missed my soulmate and could expect no joy in my life."

He had listened in resentful silence to the passionate arraignment of a tortured woman's heart. Now he cried out impatiently:

"Elinor, I was always true to you. I never had a thought of another woman!"

"I know that, Hunter. I was jealous of men, not women. You were so fond of your own sex, you spent all your time with them, you enjoyed their society more than mine, and so I was left alone, the gladness went out of my life, I grew bitter and rebellious. I wanted to get full measure of joy out of this life of mine, but my ill judged marriage had wrecked it eternally, I thought. But now—oh, Hunter, do not think me hard and cruel, for I am but just to myself and you."

"Now it seems to me that when you are gone, and I am over my grieving, I may yet retrieve the past, may yet find my twin soul, the one God created for me, and be happy. And so I cannot promise what you ask me, for it would be a wrong to myself and to my ideal, who may yet be mine. I have a right to some happiness in my life, Hunter, and why should I sacrifice all my future to you, who would not give me the past years that were rightfully mine?"

and her cheeks burned and her eyes gleamed with the truth of her words, as she arraigned her selfish, egotistical husband.

He lay gasping and soul stricken before the fire of those vivid home truths. His self love had received a cruel wound.

Despite his selfishness he had loved Elinor well after his own fashion, and he was not willing to admit that she had any cause of complaint.

In a way it enraged him that his fair, gentle young wife had dared to think out a problem of life for herself, had so individualized herself as to claim for herself a future of bliss in which he could have no part.

And just then she murmured pathetically:

"All this would have been different, Hunter, had you but loved me truly, and sought my happiness instead of your own. It was my right and your duty. And you can see, now that you have been ill for so many weeks, how little you were cared for by men in whose society you took your chief delight. Have they been near you to comfort or console? No, they scarcely give you a thought. It is I, your neglected wife, who have been your devoted nurse! And, Hunter, had you been as devoted to me these past years, I would have remained your inconsolable widow to my life's end; but, as I have said, it is—different."

Anguish flashed from his eyes as he cried out:

"I am glad you have been so frank before I made my will. I shall not leave you one penny more than you can claim under the law. The rest shall go to my children. I will not leave my money to be squandered by your second husband."

She smiled patiently, but she answered firmly:

"But I have no ambitions. I do not want my husband to be great, only good and loving, and always loath to leave my side. Yes, and to tell me sometimes that he loves me. You have forgotten for so long to tell me that, dear, but perhaps you did not guess how a woman's heart hungers for affection. I have often wished you were quite poor, Hunter. Then you would not be popular, and you would appreciate the true hearts at home more. We would work hard for our little children, and have a simple love life, finding our greatest joy in each other's company."

He put out his weak hand entreatingly.

"Nor would I sacrifice my hopes of the future for so poor a price as your gold."

Then, as if realizing suddenly that she had wounded him in his helplessness, she threw her arms about him, sobbing tenderly:

"Oh, forgive my wild words, for I am starving for a love as warm and tender as my own. My days have been so lonely while you staid away from me by day and pored over your papers by night. I have been so jealous of everybody and everything that could interest you more than I could! Perhaps I was selfish. Do you think so, dear?"

He only answered bitterly:

"I hope your second husband may realize all your ambitions."

"No more. I cannot bear it," said he in a subdued voice. "It is time for my lawyer now. Do not mind my jealous ravings, dearest. You shall have a fair share of the money, even if you give it to my rival, your second husband."

The lawyer thought that Mr. Mayo's voice was quite strong for that of a dying man, but the doctor, who happened in soon after the will was made, and the patient seemed asleep, ascribed it to the effect of excitement.

They talked a few minutes softly, and Dr. Gray whispered, undreaming that life was overhead by the patient.

"I'm glad that he provided so well for that noble little wife. He has had a hard struggle with fever these six weeks, and if anything could have saved him it would have been her devoted nursing. I'm certain he did not deserve it either, for he was one of those manly panicky husbands who don't know how to appreciate a good wife, and only go home to eat and sleep, and this fellow, they say, more often than not took dinner and supper at his club in town, leaving poor Elinor alone in their country home."

But life lingered on strangely in that wasted frame, and at last the doctor said the patient was improving, and must go off very soon to the mountains.

"It will do you and the children good, too, my darling," he said tenderly to his wife.

And she looked at him in honest surprise.

"You do not mean that you wish to take us? You know you would enjoy it better alone, or with some gentleman friend."

The shamed crimson flushed into his cheek as he kissed her little hand.

"Elinor, forgive me all the past, and let me try to make it up to you," he cried. "I never knew how well I loved you until I began to grow jealous of your probable second husband. It was that awful jealousy, I think, that snatched me back from the very grave. I am to realize your ideal, to be my own successor in your heart, to fulfill all the promise of your second husband. Will you let me try, my darling? Come with me—you and the ladies—and let us begin our new, sweet love life now!"

"Gladly," smiled the forgiving wife—Atlanta Constitution.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Don't You Know

that you can secure almost immediate relief from Indigestion, and that uncomfortable fullness after meals, by simply taking a dose of Simmons Liver Regulator?

Some people think that because it is called Liver Regulator it has nothing to do with Indigestion and the like. It is the inaction of the Liver that causes Indigestion, and that fullness; also Constipation, and those Bilious Headaches. Millions have been made to understand this and have been cured from these troubles by Simmons Liver Regulator—a medicine unfailing and purely vegetable.

From Rev. M. B. Wharton, Baltimore, Md. "It affords me pleasure to add my testimony to the great virtues of Simmons Liver Regulator. I have had experience with it, as occasion demanded, for many years, and regard it as the greatest medicine of the times. So good a medicine deserves universal commendation."

"I am glad you have been so frank before I made my will. I shall not leave you one penny more than you can claim under the law. The rest shall go to my children. I will not leave my money to be squandered by your second husband."

On Tuesday in Santa Rosa at the Athenaeum there was almost a panic created by some person yelling fire. But the presence of mind of a few cool heads prevented a terrible calamity.

Already half-a-dozen Democratic lady aspirants are out for Postmaster of Sonoma, while almost every able-bodied Democrat in the community has his eye on the Bonded Warehouse. Verily this is a great county.

There is a pound or fifteen governing this town, but it appears to be a dead letter, as cows are allowed to roam around the streets at will. Mr. Marshall, will you kindly enforce the law and take up these degrading animals and relieve a long suffering community?

Sheriff-elect Sam Allen has decided to appoint ex-Supervisor Geo. F. Allen of Petaluma as his Under Sheriff. Geo. F. Allen made an honest and capable Supervisor and is in every way qualified for the position. The new Sheriff could not have made a better selection.

How to save money is a problem that interests everybody. One way to do it is to invigorate the system with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Being a highly concentrated blood medicine, it is the most powerful and economical. Fold for a dollar a bottle, but is worth five.

Democrats are scarce in Sonoma Township who voted against J. C. Sims for the Assembly. But just the same there were 48 who did that very same thing. We will wager dollars to doughnuts that these will be the very first ones to whoop'er up for Cleveland and petition for an office.

A slight change in the time table of the Sonoma Valley Branch of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railway will go into effect on and after tomorrow (Monday, November 20th). The morning passenger train will now leave Sonoma week days for San Francisco and way stations at 6:28 instead of at 6:35 as heretofore. On Sunday mornings the train will leave at 8 o'clock as heretofore.

Allen Bryant, the defeated Republican nominee for County Treasurer, won $50 from a Mr. Johnson of Bloomfield the other day. It appears that Johnson had asserted during the campaign that Mr. Bryant had swindled one of his partners in his grocery business in Santa Rosa out of $300 and he offered to bet that gentleman $50 that he could not exculpate himself of the charge. Last Monday Mr. Bryant proved by affidavits that the story was a campaign lie and the wager was awarded him. Mr. Bryant, very properly, does not intend to let the matter drop here but will prosecute the party who caused the report to be circulated. The Petaluma "Imprint" is authority for the above.

The Democrats painted the town red last Thursday evening the occasion being the celebration of their recent victory over the Republican party. There was a parade, bonfires, fireworks and a meeting at Union Hall. Speeches were made by Emmet Seawell, Hon. J. C. Sims and Capt. P. N. Stofen. The hall, which had been beautifully decorated by the Democratic ladies, was crowded and much enthusiasm prevailed and the reception accorded Messrs. Sims, Seawell and Stofen amounted to a perfect ovation. After the speaking there was a social hop, music being furnished by the Sonoma Valley Band.

All the latest styles in Fall and Winter millinery at Miss S. Robinson's, Main St., Petaluma.

The Chemical Works.

Subscriptions to the capital stock of the Sonoma Chemical Works continues to pour in. Last week C. F. Leiding subscribed $2000, bringing the total amount so far subscribed up to $10,000. It is thought that the entire amount necessary to start the works will be forthcoming before the first of next month. Almost every property owner in Sonoma contemplates taking stock in the enterprise, which is represented by Messrs. Stevenot and Duhring to be a good investment.

At present there are only two chemical works in the United States that manufacture chrome. One is located at Baltimore and the other at Philadelphia. Both are producing the chrome iron ore in California, as it cannot be found in any other part of the United States except on the Pacific Coast. This ore is to be found in abundance in Sonoma county and in fact in half of the counties of the State. Therefore works of this kind cannot fail to be more profitable here than those established in the East.

Chrome is used for dyeing purposes, for the manufacture of colors for electric batteries and a number of uses in the arts. Besides the total production by the Baltimore and Philadelphia works, nearly 1,500,000 lbs. are annually imported from Scotland into the United States. Price of chrome in New York 10¢ to 11¢ per pound; in San Francisco 13¢ per pound. Sonoma has all the advantages necessary to make such works successful.

Baletti vs. Sparks.

In the case of Baletti et al. vs. Sparks et al. a motion has been filed in the Superior Court of this county by the defendants to dismiss motion made by plaintiff for a new trial. The time in which to make amendments to the above motion has been extended thirty days.

To the People of Sonoma Valley.

I take this method of publicly acknowledging my sincere thanks to the people of Sonoma Valley for the generous aid extended to me in my late misfortune.

We were pleased to find Dr. H. K. McClelland comfortably located in Santa Rosa. The doctor and his father and brother are well known to the writer. Dr. H. K. McClelland, Sr. in his lifetime was the leading physician of Washington county, Pa., having attained great eminence as a skilled surgeon. Darwin McClelland, a brother of the doctor at Santa Rosa, was previous to his death, a wholesale druggist in Wellsburg, W. Va., also a leading politician of the Republican party of Virginia. Knowing these facts it gave us pleasure to learn from the leading citizens of Santa Rosa that the doctor was meeting with success which he justly deserves, owing to his skill and ability as a physician and surgeon. As an eminent public speaker the doctor is highly regarded by many citizens of Healdsburg can attest.—Healdsburg Tribune.

WAS IT A CONSPIRACY?

The Strange Story Connected With Ernest Geiger.

It will be remembered that a few days ago one Ernest Geiger was arrested on the charge of larceny. He was the man Constable Barnhardt had such an exciting episode with and who, to escape, jumped into Sonoma creek and "ducked" for a few moments. After being landed in the jail, Geiger began to show unmistakable evidences of insanity. He refused to eat for several days, tore off his clothing and in many ways showed that he was a proper person to be sent to an asylum. Last week he grew worse and, finally, he was taken before the superior judge, duly examined, found to be insane and sent to Napa.

When Geiger was charged with the theft of some buggy robes, whips etc., he stoutly protested his innocence. Previously he had borne a good reputation. He is a bachelor, lived in a little cabin near Los Guillicos and was in comfortable circumstances. He owned a team, went well dressed, had a gold watch and always had a number of dollars rattling in his pockets; apparently he was one of the last men in the world to be tempted to steal anything. In his cabin, it is claimed, he had some very good furniture and many little articles of value to himself. It is claimed that there was no reason why he should steal the articles he was charged with purloining, and he so earnestly declared. It is claimed that when the stolen articles were found in Geiger's cabin he said he did not put them there. He asserted that he knew nothing about them. But the goods were there and apparently he must be guilty, and so he was arrested. Now, it is claimed by some, that a party who had a bitter animosity against Geiger had been the missing articles placed in Geiger's cabin for the purpose of entrapping him. It has even been hinted that Geiger was favorably impressed with a young woman living near him and that certain persons were not pleased with the attention he was paying her; that in order to get rid of him, to get him out of the country, and in such a way that would dispose of him most effectually, the articles were put in his cabin for the purpose of entrapping him. Geiger's arrest and the prospect of a term in the penitentiary appalled him. Not familiar with the ways of the world, he was greatly worried and fretted about his condition night and day. He could not eat, and sleep was out of the question. Day by day his condition grew worse and at last he became a raving maniac. These statements have been made to the county officials, and it is reported they will make careful investigation into the premises. If it is true that Geiger has been made the object of such persecution, the prison doors should promptly close behind the parties responsible for such actions.—Santa Rosa Republican.
